Department of Education Publishes Blog on College and Career Pathways

Last week, the U.S. Department of Education published a blog post titled, Career and College Pathways in Action: Top Takeaways from Experts in the Field, written by Assistant Secretary for Career, Technical, and Adult Education Amy Loyd. The blog post summarized key takeaways from a recent webinar hosted by the Department, which featured Mr. Farhad Asghar, Program Officer for Pathways to Postsecondary Success Program, Carnegie Corporation of New York; Mr. Jarrad Toussant, Senior Vice President, Dallas Regional Chamber; Dr. Lisa Small, Superintendent of Schools, Township High School District 211; Dr. Eloy Ortiz Oakley, Chancellor, California Community Colleges; and Mr. Neil Sullivan, Executive Director, Boston Private Industry Council. Assistant Secretary Loyd highlighted findings from the webinar that included best practices to cultivate, strengthen, and grow the ecosystem necessary for employers and youth to thrive. These include:

- Using data strategically
- Elevating student and parent voices
- Embracing career-connected learning
- Empowering students to own their futures
- Discovering and applying innovative strategies
- Blending funding to create sustainable pathways
- Intertwining college and career-connected learning
- Engaging opponents and find places of consensus
- Focusing on the intersection of educators and employers
- Partnering with intermediaries

“Our nation's future depends upon an educated and skilled workforce—especially as economic mobility is in decline and the world of work is rapidly shifting,” said Assistant Secretary Loyd. “The preparation of young people through career and college pathways is a powerful, evidence- and research-based approach to provide students with the education and experience they need and deserve to participate in our democracy and thrive in our economy.”

College Avenue Student Loans Survey Finds Half of Families Plan to Borrow to Finance Postsecondary Education

Today, College Avenue Student Loans released the results of a survey that found more than half of families plan to borrower student or parent loans in order to pay for tuition bills and other college expenses. The survey, conducted by Barnes and Noble College Insights, found that nearly three out of four respondents (74 percent) said they found the cost of college to be surprisingly high. The top three areas of unexpected higher costs were tuition and fees, room and board, and a child's personal expenses.

To help manage the financial gap, more than half of families (54 percent) plan to borrow, including federal student loans (43 percent), private student loans (15 percent), and parent loans (18 percent). For some families, they plan to use a combination of the above loans. The survey also found that finding solutions to finance college is important to families – nearly all (91 percent) parents of college-aged students strongly agree a college degree is important for their child's future.

NCAN Report Finds Increase in FAFSA Applications This Year

The National College Attainment Network (NCAN) recently published a report based on data from its FAFSA [Free Application for Federal Student Aid] tracker on the Form Your Future website, which found that, through July 1st, FAFSA applications are up by 4.6 percent from the previous year. This represents that high school seniors have filed an additional 92,000 applications. NCAN estimates that 52.1 percent of high school seniors completed the FAFSA application this year; although the figure is not as high as pre-pandemic levels, it still shows an increase over 2020 and 2021 completion rates. The data demonstrates strong increases in applications from low-income public schools and includes gains across most states – only 11 states had fewer applications in 2022 compared to the previous year. This morning, Politico talked with NCAN Senior Director of Data and Strategic Initiatives Bill DeBaun where he said, “We just had a much more normal academic year. But we are still not back to pre-pandemic normalcy and may not ever be. Students were better connected with college and career advising services being back in person in high school...The other piece is the economy is very hot right now. High school seniors are thinking about, "Do I want to go into the workforce or do I want to pursue a college education?" For some students, when starting wages are so high right now, they may think to themselves, “I’m gonna delay it for a semester or a year.” In the report, NCAN noted that postsecondary education enrollment rates are usually tied to FAFSA completion rates, so the organization will continue to track high school class of 2022 data in order to determine whether this class will reverse the enrollment trends of recent years.
